Abstract

The project explores how the digital age has transformed the concept of forgetting, once essential for filtering knowledge, into a challenge of erasure. It investigates the ethical, legal, psychological, and cultural implications of data permanence and the loss of agency over forgetting. Through an interdisciplinary approach, it examines memory, digital traceability, and the right to forget. The outcomes aim to inform the cultural and social dimensions of the digital transition, aligning with key goals of the National Recovery and Resilience Plan (PNRR).
